2013 Could Bring Significant Change to the Nonprofit Sector

After facing the challenging economic times of the last few years, some nonprofit executives are more hopeful about the future of the sector. They are wisely revisiting their organization's strategy, business plan and governance to determine how the nonprofit can more efficiently and effectively meet its objectives. This month's LeadTime examines how the board, executive director and other stakeholders could work together to meet organizational objectives and impact.

Strategy Counts! Keeping an Eye on the Horizon

Michael Mortell, director of the Alliance for Children and Families Strategy Counts Initiative, believes that strategic planning is a vital part of meeting long-term, mission driven objectives. He warned, however, that a strategic plan only works when it is integrated into the daily operations of the organization's management process. To accomplish this, he suggests that the board of directors should use the plan to set the strategic direction for the organization. The board should empower the executive director to operationalize the plan, measure performance and adjust where necessary, to achieve maximum utility of the strategic plan.

How to Establish a Good ED-Board Relationship

It is never too late to start working on improving the relationship between the executive director and the board. Studies have shown that a poor ED/ board relationship is one of the most significant contributors to ED burnout. A good relationship between the executive director and the board could lead to a more positive organizational climate and greater impact. A recent article by the Bridgespan Group offers advice on how to establish a good ED/board relationship.

Exploring Emerging Forms of Nonprofit Governance

An article in the January 2013 Nonprofit Quarterly makes the point that boards are an essential piece of a larger puzzle that makes up nonprofit governance. Boards have fiduciary responsibility for the organization, but determining what the organization does to fulfill its mission in the community is collectively a stakeholder decision. Nonprofit stakeholders include the board, the executive director, staff, volunteers, funders and an increasing number of socially interested parties. Social stakeholders can sometimes exert their influence when the organization's mission is no longer keeping step with common social values. Recent examples of how social stakeholders influence nonprofits have been the Susan G Komen Foundation and the Boy Scouts of America. The article suggests that organizational leaders should encourage forms of governance that include the broader perspective of stakeholders in the decision-making process.

Key Nonprofit Trends to Watch in 2013

Blackbaud, a provider of nonprofit services and software, identifies the following trends that could have a significant impact on the nonprofit sector in 2013.

1. The relatively flat giving in 2012 and slow economic recovery will lead to a more competitive fundraising environment
 2. There is a merging of nonprofit and for-profit business practices, bringing together sustainability and effectiveness and mission-driven passion
 3. More nonprofits will be testing the use of mobile technologies as a way of reaching their supporters
 4. Web and mobile-based technologies are shrinking the globe for nonprofit organizations, allowing them to interact with supporters and beneficiaries around the world

Tips for Constructing an Elevator Pitch

As a member of a nonprofit board of directors, one of your primary responsibilities is to serve as an ambassador for your organization. How can you make new friends for your organization? How can you engage people in a limited amount of time and in a way that captures their attention and leaves them wanting to know more? Try developing an "elevator pitch."
